

TREND LEADER
December 13, 2006, page 4

New Catholic high schools will cost the churchgoers

Dear Editor,

I sincerely hope that the Archdiocese thinks long and hard about these new schools. The percentage of those surveyed is very small. The tuition would have to be raised.

The burden would not only be on those Catholic parents but also on parishioners.

We recently experienced this in my parish with a new school, and although many pledged, for one reason or another, they have not followed up on their pledge. Their reasons may be perfectly legitimate, illness, loss of work, etc. Others in the parish will be asked to contribute more.

Now we have a weekly second collection for the building fund. I was raised to not purchase until I had enough money, but society today wants it all, regardless of the debt.

As a senior, I pray that will consider updating the present schools as they have the finances and not going further into debt, particularly for "state of the art" facilities.

Our church and our country are in enough financial debt.

Sincerely yours,
Anita Bruno
Chalfont